A plan for wet weather

Name _____ Date _____

A walking group plans a two-hour trip on Sunday. Several members are new, and one cannot walk quickly. The leader compares two suggestions. The first is to continue in all weather because the route is familiar. The second is to check the forecast and use a shorter sheltered route if heavy rain is likely.

The leader chooses the second plan. A familiar route can still become unsuitable, and the slower walker needs enough time. If the forecast predicts heavy rain, the group will meet at the community hall and take the short route. If conditions are worse than expected, they will stay indoors for a map-reading session.

Members must confirm attendance by Saturday evening. The leader will send the final plan after checking the forecast. Nobody should leave for the original meeting point until that message arrives.

The decision gives everyone a useful activity while recognizing the group's limits. It also makes the conditions explicit. Members do not have to guess whether "bad weather" means a light shower or heavy rain.
