Name _____ Date _____

The local podcast's latest episode discusses a new evening bus. It states that the service runs until ten and quotes the published timetable. It also includes two passenger interviews. One passenger says the later bus makes study easier; the other says the route does not reach her area.

A listener posts, "This is the best transport change the town has ever made." That is a judgment, not a fact established by the timetable. Another listener says nobody uses the bus, although the episode supplies no passenger totals. That statement cannot be checked from the information given.

In a review, Farah praises the clear explanation of the timetable and the inclusion of different experiences. However, she notes that two interviews cannot represent every passenger. She would like a later episode to include usage figures and responses from areas without a stop.

Farah still recommends the episode to new residents because it provides a useful introduction. Her review distinguishes what the podcast documents from what listeners conclude. She can enjoy the episode while identifying a limitation.
