A proposal after the trial

CEFR B1 | Unit 9: Participation | Reading

Read the original text. You may underline evidence and reread as needed.

Name _____ Date _____

The library tested a Saturday study club for four weeks. Twenty places were offered each week. The first two sessions were full, but only twelve learners attended the last session. A notice describes the trial as "successful" without explaining what success means.

The learner group gathers comments. Some people liked the quiet workspace. Others could not attend because the session overlapped with a bus timetable. Two people thought registration had closed because an old message remained on the website.

The group proposes a later start and a clearer registration notice. It does not claim these changes will solve every attendance problem. Instead, it recommends another four-week trial, recording attendance and asking people who did not attend about their reasons.

In its discussion, the group says the old notice should have been removed sooner. It also recognizes what has been achieved: a room has been made available and several learners have used it regularly. The proposal connects the suggested changes to the specific barriers reported, while leaving room for further feedback.

Original Ilmiya practice text. Scenarios and research examples are fictional.